patients' profiles. However, statistically significant and clinically meaningful (e.g., greater than 5 T-score points) ethnic differences were found, with White patients (White men in particular) scoring higher on the Psychasthenia, Schizophrenia, and Social Introversion Scales. Comparison of the combined college and community samples found both ethnic groups scored well within normal limits and indicated statistically significant overall profile differences between Mexican-Americans and Whites. Univariate analyses of the MMPI-2 Validity and Clinical scales revealed that the apparent profile differences were attributable to the tendency of Mexican-American women to score significantly higher on the Lie scale than other groups. No other clinically meaningful ethnic differences were observed. In summary, MMPI-2 comparisons of Mexican-Americans and Whites from college and community samples of similar ages and educational backgrounds indicated small mean differences which were isolated on specific scales, and were not always clinically meaningful. Although Mexican-American acculturation was found to be a significant moderator of Mexican-American patients' MMPI-2 performance, White patients scored higher on the MMPI-2. However, considering the small number of patients included in this study and the inclusion of only schizophrenic spectrum patients, this finding is considered tentative and not generalizable to other diagnostic groups.
